The introduction of antibiotics has practically eliminated infection of the paranasal sinuses as source of intracranial infections. Thoracic surgery has nearly eradicated a formerly fairly frequent source of abscess of the brain, namely infections of the lung, such as lung abscess, bronchiectasia and lung gangrene. Gunshot wounds of the head are of course a very important cause of brain abscess and meningitis, but in civilian practice fortunately rare. Complicated fractures of the vault and fractures of the base of the skull are at present the most important source of intracranial infection, and are likely to increase in importance due to ever increasing frequency of motor accidents. Metastatic brain abscess originating from a focus of infection of the tonsils or from other lesions anywhere in the body are on the whole rare. This source of infection must be considered to be of minor importance. These facts are clearly reflected in Dr. IRSIGLER'S monograph. There is an abundance of material of traumatic abscesses both due to gunshot wounds and to peacetime accidents involving the vault, the base of the skull and the paranasal sinuses, which is extensively documented by case histories and well chosen illustrations.
