Diana Mayo is a young English girl, self-willed and fearless. When she plans a tour into the desert, unchaperoned, and with only natives in attendance, neither her friends nor her brother can dissuade her. So she starts, but very shortly is captured by the Sheik, an Arabic chieftain with no standards of morality save those of a caveman. His caveman treatment of her, however, wins her, for after a few months of agonizing and despair, she suddenly finds herself desperately in love with him, and only fearful lest she may have to leave him. Incidents of her attempted escape and return, her capture by a hostile tribe and her thrilling rescue, add to the lurid atmosphere of the story.

“The story is entertaining in description and episode. It does not lack thrills. It is unusual in many ways. In this case the unusual is made to become commonplace though the interest is maintained from the beginning.”
—The Boston Transcript

“The central idea of it stands out, poisonously salacious in conception. It is not prudery to stamp it as vicious. The story has undeniably vivid scenes of dramatic value.”
—Literary Review

“Outside of the shocker-appeal it must be admitted that the novel is written with a high degree of literary skill in so far as the handling of incidents and suggestion of the reality of the characters involved is accomplished.... ”
—New York Times
